Directions: Read the following passage carefully and answer the question by choosing the best alternative for each question from A, B, C, or D.

The subject of wine is a fascinating one to some! To others it may be a bore, and to others something that is quite incomprehensible is the most problem in English, and this is a shame - they simply don’t know what they are missing. The loving thing about getting to know your wine is to drink it! This most pleasant of pastimes, coupled with a little concentration and intelligent observation, can be repaid with a great deal of enjoyment. Quite simply wine is the fermented juice of the grape. Fermentation is the conversion, induced by yeast cells, of the grape sugar into alcohol — and there you have wine.

The vines have lain dormant all winter. In early summer they flower and produce grapes which develop until autumn when they are ready to be harvested, and the vintage begins. The harvested grapes are pressed to extract the juice and the ‘must’ as the juice is called - - then ferments in huge vats for anything from two to fourteen days, depending on the quality of the wine to be produced. Red wines have a longer fermentation period than white wines, as the whole grape is fermented within the juice to extract the full colour, flavour and tannin. Tannin is an important element in red wine. It enables the juice to be kept for long periods while it matures.

There is little tannin in white grapes, so the juice is fermented without the skins and for a shorter period than for red wines. The ‘must’ in the vats seethes and bubbles during fermentation, and a close watch has to be maintained on the temperature - - a fast, hot fermentation can spoil the wines, making them harsh and coarse. When all activity has ceased, the wines are run from the vats into barrels - - leaving behind the skins and sediment - - and are left to settle for several months.

During this period new sediment, which is the accumulation of dead yeast cells, is forming all the time, so periodically the wine is run off into new barrels. This is called ‘racking’. The final step in eliminating any cloudiness in the wine after racking, is ‘fining’. Natural substances are added to collect any remaining particles and to ensure that the wine is clear and pure. Then it is ready for bottling.

13. The word “This” in line 2 means________________.
A. the idea that the subject of wine is boring
B. the idea that the subject of wine is simple
C. the idea that the subject of wine is attractive

14. The word “This” in line 4 refers to __________________.
A. drinking your wine
B. observing your wine
C. concentrating on your wine
D. getting to know your wine

15. The word “dormant” in line 10 means_____________.
A. inactive
B. busy
C. flowery
D. dropping the leaves

16. The word “vintage” in line 12 means_____________.
A. the pressing of the grapes
B. the process of wine making
C. the picking of the ripe grapes
D. the old fashioned method of wine making
